

GREAT INSTRUCTIONAL COACHING INVOLVES:

 Laura Christian
@MrsLChristian

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 2 others

Listen, listen, listen some more. Questioning and listening not only allow you to gain an understanding of the current reality but also build relationships. Also, remember that the behaviors you model set the tone not only in a classroom but with how coaching is perceived :)

 Chris
@itsott

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 3 others

The skills which made you a teacher deemed worthy of sharing your expertise serve you as a leader of adult learners. Listen 1st. Stay tethered to the classroom as much as your role will allow. If you ask Ts to do something, make it a tool for them & not a task for someone else.

 Dr. Ricks
@scholar1908

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 2 others

Establish rapport and meaningful relationships w/ the individuals that you are leading—Also, be sure to presume competence not only w/ students but the adults as well! #Allin 🐾 #Relationshipsmatter

 Amelia Pflieger
@pfliegerelem

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 2 others

Relationships relationships relationships. Fostering effective dialogue is key. Providing questions for teachers to come to their own answers is most effective. Telling is not coaching. Questioning is coaching.

 Catherine Morelli
@kitpc93

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 2 others

Learn context. Build relationships. Go for little wins. Start with "What can I do for you?"

 Colleen Worrell
@cdworrell

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 2 others

How exciting! My advice=Make sure you have a clear, coherent, shared understanding of what "coaching" is & what the role involves in your school/district

 Clorinda Roache
@ClorindaRoache

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 2 others

Presume positive intent. Listen more, say less. Best wishes as you begin this important work!

 Kristine Lindeblad
@Kristiblad

Replying to @DeniseBearden @jimknight99 and 2 others

Listen, be transparent, assume they know things, be trust-worthy 😊